Never before has there been as much movement between the top teams as there is right now. Six teams begin the season with one loss each, and some changes will occur from here on out as the pressure and desire of wanting a championship will change the tides of power for these teams and have them enter battle for second and third place. So to get right into this, here are the five teams that we are going to try and keep an eye on moving forward. 1. Oregon (Last year's rank: No. 1) Last year's 7-5 record was absolutely mind-blowing for the Ducks. Oregon was just so. damn. good. Oregon was the first team I remember that absolutely dominated every facet of the game, and I've seen at least a handful of games from each year to this one, so needless to say, I've seen it all. Coach Mark Helfrich has a strategy. He implements it on every play. He commands respect. Oregon is the best team in the nation by a landslide and it won't be even a close competition in this year's championship match. 2. Alabama (Last year's rank: No. 2) Alabama is the reigning national champs, a title that they won back in 2016. Since that time, they haven't won any new championships. However, the Crimson Tide are back, and they're arguably the strongest team of their recent championship run. Like Oregon, Alabama does it all. They outscore every team they play against with the exception of Mississippi State in the title match. With the team chemistry Helfrich has built, Alabama will go down as one of the best college football teams ever. 3. Clemson (Last year's rank: No. 3) Last year, Clemson won their first ACC Championship since 2010. Those last three words set up an end goal in mind for Coach Dabo Swinney and his team. Like every other team that is ahead of them, Clemson won't have an easy game in
